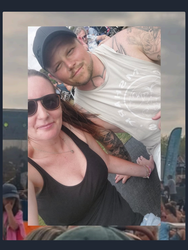
Jack Cannon - Cannon Coaching



I didn't just lose weight. I rebuilt myself.

I started at 18 stone, burnt out, second-guessing everything, and stuck in a cycle of habits I knew weren't helping but had no idea how to break. I'd walk into the gym with no plan, no structure, and no clue what I was actually doing. Jumping from one machine to the next. Overthinking every choice. Leaving feeling like I'd tried... but not actually moved the needle.

And outside the gym? I've been the one sat at a family BBQ, everyone else just eating and enjoying themselves, while I'm deep in my own head - calculating, justifying, worrying. Thinking about weigh-ins. Rehearsing how I'll explain gaining weight because I ate normal food in a normal situation. That shame sticks with you. It takes up space it has no right to occupy.

The Loop I Was Stuck In

- "I'll start properly Monday"
- "I've messed it up now"
- "I just need to try harder"

Sound familiar? I lived that. Repeatedly. For years.

The Advice I Got

The standard script: "Just eat less." "Just be more disciplined." "Just try harder."

If any of that actually worked, I wouldn't have been stuck in the first place. If you're reading this and it sounds familiar - it's not a willpower problem. It never was.

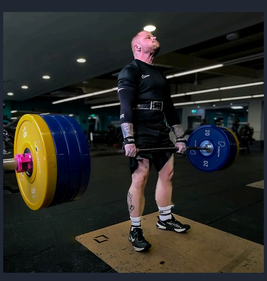
What I actually needed wasn't more pressure. It was structure. Something that worked when motivation had long since packed its bags and left. Something that didn't collapse the moment I stopped being perfect because perfection was never going to be the plan.

On top of all of that, I was navigating life as a trans man with ADHD. Most fitness advice didn't fit my life, my brain, or my reality. It wasn't built for people like me. So instead of forcing myself into systems that weren't designed with me in mind, I stopped trying. And I built my own.

Not perfectly. Not overnight. But properly. I developed structure. Resilience. The ability to keep going when the goalposts moved - because they always do, and anyone who tells you otherwise is selling something.

The Shame Was Real

Calculating every bite at social events. Dreading the weigh-in. Feeling like your body was a problem to solve in front of everyone. The lack of the right framework can be toxic.



Structure Changed Everything

Not motivation. Not a new programme every Monday. Structure a system that worked on the hard days, the tired days, the "I really can't be arsed" days. That's what actually moves the dial over time.

Now I'm A Personal Trainer & Online Coach

That's a long way from guy who had no idea what machine to use next. The transformation wasn't just physical - it was total. Body, mindset, identity.

Who I Work With

I work with people who are sick of starting over - people who want a plan that actually survives real life, instead of falling apart the second things get messy.

Feel lost walking into the gym

You shouldn't have to guess your way through every session. If the gym feels overwhelming, you don't need more motivation - you need a clear way in.

Overthink everything and end up stuck

If you're neurodivergent, decision fatigue can hit hard. You don't need to be "less in your head" - you need a structure that takes the pressure off making every choice on the fly.

Tired of starting over every Monday

That fresh-start cycle is brutal. The guilt. The reset. The promise that "this week will be different" - and then the same crash all over again.

Want real change - not another quick fix

If you're ready for something sustainable, honest, and built around your real life, let's talk. I'll help you build a plan you can actually stick to.

Navigating dysphoria

If fitness has ever made you feel more aware of your body in all the wrong ways, you're not alone. Dysphoria, body image, and spaces that were never built with trans people in mind can make training feel heavy before you even start. You deserve support that gets that.

My coaching is built entirely on lived experience - not just theory dressed up as authority. I work with clients across the UK and internationally. Whether you're in PureGym, training at home, or making the most of another gym your plan adapts. The standard doesn't.

> I'm not here to tell you to try harder. I'm here to show you how to stop starting over.